

Acupressure for Low Back Pain

What is acupressure?

Acupressure has long been used in traditional Chinese medicine. It is like acupuncture, but without needles. During acupressure, the caregiver puts gentle pressure on certain areas of the body to relieve symptoms such as pain, nausea, and anxiety. Acupressure does not replace your regular medical treatment plan or emergency care, but can be safely used with your current therapies.

The names of the points don't always match the location on the body. For example, some acupressure points are named after organs (such as the stomach and liver).

Is it safe?

Yes. There are very few risks to using acupressure on a child or adult. Certain acupressure points should not be used during pregnancy. See the instructions for specific sites for more information”

What are the risks?

There are very few risks to using acupressure on a child or adult. Hard or deep pressure is not needed and not recommended. Pressing too hard may bruise the skin and cause pain.

How is it done?

You can do acupressure on yourself, or on someone else. Don't worry about hitting the exact location. You can still get relief if you are close to the desired acupressure point.

- Relax your body. Try to get rid of distractions. Take a few deep breaths.
- Apply gentle pressure to the points. If you feel pain, lighten pressure to avoid bruising.
- Follow the 5-point method. Hold each point for 1 minute.
